Don’t Remember A Door Being There…

While relocating a mural and making some much-needed improvements to the exhibit gallery, we discovered a door leading to nowhere!

The space that currently exhibits water development was once a bathroom when the museum was a plantation home. It was a “Jack and Jill” type of design, with a door on opposite sides of the room, each leading to a different bedroom. The other side of the door is walled off, and makes for a peculiar optical illusion.

We don’t know why it was leftover during the conversion from house to museum, but it is an interesting glimpse into the past. Since our mission is to preserve and present, we will close it back up and save it for another time.
