Autonomous Cars: Past Present & Future

Presenter: Ali Maleki, Executive Director of Innovations & New Ventures, Nexteer

The automotive industry is undergoing significant changes. These changes will provide vastly new and different mobility options that will impact every aspect of our lives. With the improvements in the speed and performance of advanced electronics and processing units coupled with advancements in artificial intelligence, sensing and computer vision, self-driving vehicles are becoming a reality. Autonomous cars will span many areas of technology and will have fundamental societal impacts. Car ownership models, licensing, regulations, insurance, legal and liability aspects, communication and data security requirements, infrastructure and road-side equipment needs are anticipated to create a one trillion dollar market by 2025.

This talk is an introduction to autonomous vehicles and reviews the history of the self-driving vehicles, the important factors in the evolution of these systems, near term configuration of vehicles and a few alternative scenarios for the future of mobility and the long-term effects of autonomous cars.

Ali Maleki has been in the automotive and truck electronics industry since 1988. He has developed software and hardware in nearly all automotive and heavy-duty truck electronics areas. Ali has led engineering teams in large corporations and small startups, and has been on international assignments in Germany, France and China, leading multinational teams in developing common global platforms.

Hello OLLI friends,
 Small moments of delight are important in these days.

So the other day I was searching on the Internet for an explanation of the phenomenon many of us have seen on our ponds and lakes: in a hard rain with no wind, patches of the water are like clear glass, and others are opaque. Why?

I found a detailed analysis, with pictures, at <http://blog.kootenay-lake.ca/>, which turns out to be a blog by a meteorologist retired from faculty at Penn State University. It seems he wanders the shores and hills around Kootenay Lake in British Columbia, taking the most astonishing photographs and posting them. The detail of birds and insects and the sheer awareness of bear, deer, and rainbows is remarkable. My personal favorite is at <http://blog.kootenay-lake.ca/?p=17802>, where a white tail buck meditates.

And about that lake pattern: here is the discussion: <http://blog.kootenay-lake.ca/?p=272>
 My takeaway is that upwelling is the probable cause of the glassy areas, but that the presence of surfactants might also be a factor.

But forget surfactants and upwelling and revel in the lovely photographs by this wonderful blogger. I did.

Leslie Sanders, OLLI Advisory Board Chair

Jewish Garment Workers' Experience in The Great American Urban Centers

Presented by Ingrid G. Hoskins

Addressing the ideological changes that shifted within European societies that led Jewish citizens to uproot their lives and cross the sea entering the United States. Also evaluating the experiences of Jewish ghetto communities in urban cities. Jewish immigrants composed a large percentage of the American Garment industry workers. The immigrants worked for low wages in adverse conditions yet were able to hold on to a sense of community. Immigrants have had a profound impact on American culture and heritage. What role did anti-Semitism play in urban Jewish society?

The Significance of the Second Hague Conference: An American Perspective of Optimism

Mathew J. Rayl

Heavily grounded in primary source research, this presentation primarily examines how writers of The Advocate of Peace publication perceived the Second Hague Conference as a movement toward a peaceful world, despite the intense rivalries and tension among the European nations. Ultimately, observers today have little trouble understanding that the peace movements in the buildup to World War One failed, but historians often overlook the optimism many people felt as they saw the conferences happen.
