California Regional Director, American Farmland Trust

American Farmland Trust (AFT), a national non-profit conservation organization, is looking for an outstanding mid-career executive to become the director of its California operation.

The California Regional Director is responsible for leading and organizing AFT's research, public education, demonstration and policy advocacy activities in California in coordination with the national AFT office to advance the organization's mission of "Saving the Land that Sustains Us" by protecting farmland, promoting environmentally sound farming practices and helping farmers stay on the land. The California Regional Director reports directly to AFT's Senior Vice President of Policy and Programs. AFT's principal California office is in Sacramento, but the Director may be located elsewhere if necessary and practical.

Of paramount importance to the position of California Regional Director is considerable experience in development and advocacy of public policy in the fields of land use, conservation and agriculture, particularly in California. Demonstrated success in advancing a policy agenda by marshalling evidence and orchestrating political support will carry significant weight in evaluating candidates. A practical working knowledge of agriculture and an understanding of the culture of farmers and ranchers are also highly desirable. Experience in nonprofit organizational management is also strongly encouraged, though not required. The position also requires at least a bachelor's degree in a field related to AFT's mission, though a relevant masters or doctoral degree is preferred.
