For parents of children of ALL ages!

Do you know how children learn about race? The answers may surprise you...

Research has found that infants are able to nonverbally categorize people by race and gender at just 6 months old. Numerous studies show that 3-5 year olds categorize people by race and exhibit bias based on race.

You may wonder if it is too late to speak with your child about race if s/he is already in school. Don't worry – you have not missed your window of opportunity, it is never too late.

You may wonder how to start conversations about race with your child?

Find out answers to these questions by joining us for this important parent education session, co-sponsored by the PTA to learn more.
