Leading supply chain organizations use true demand to increase service levels and grow sales. Especially as omni-channel commerce increases complexity and retailers put increasing pressure on consumer goods companies, managing to end-customer demand is key to keeping up with a fast changing market. Developing a single source of truth across your supply chain can help you strengthen your relationships with internal and external partners, and quickly collaborate to respond to the market, avoiding out-of-stocks and over-stocks.

Join us to learn why downstream sales and inventory visibility is critical to best-in-class supply chain organizations, and how you can start (or accelerate) leveraging it efficiently to gain a competitive advantage. We'll share best practices for advancing from data ingestion to predictive analytics to decision-making, like forecasting and product launch management.

The success of a distribution facility is tied directly to the productivity and efficiency of your hourly workforce. For the past 11 years, ProLogistix has commissioned a survey of warehouse employees around the country to determine what is most important to them as it relates to their jobs.

During this encore presentation with Brian Devine, you'll get an update on the labor market, receive the results of our national survey of over 15,000 hourly workers and receive recommendations on how you can attract and retain the best workers in the market.

Board Member, APICS Industrial Crescent Chapter

One of the top challenges in the end-to-end Supply Chain world today is finding & successfully hiring qualified talent, especially given the industry's digital transformation. In fact, a 2018 survey of over 1,000 business leaders by The Conference Board showed that the top concern for CEOs is "finding and retaining talent". In this webinar, Jessica Clayton with TalentStream will share key insight and data points from the Supply Chain talent market, based on interactions with hundreds of hiring managers and thousands of candidates. Attendees will learn more about today's market and candidate needs & motivations, as well as best practices for ensuring you hire the best fit for your organization.
