

Shifting Your Leadership Style to Retain Millennial Employees

The New Realities of the 21st Century Workplace

New generations of employees naturally want and expect collaborative relationships with management. The days of “command and control” are behind us. Millennials were raised with constant coaching and are looking for coaches, not bosses.

When leaders adjust their styles to coach their employees, Millennials feel empowered to participate more and their strengths can be leveraged.

Coaching requires different skills. But, they are skills that can be learned.

Join SMC as we present:
