If you were to rank every major religious faith group around the world by size, it might surprise you to learn that the nonreligious and unaffiliated would currently rank third overall. A finding like that might surprise you because record-setting numbers of nonbelievers and so-called 'Nones' of the census do not tend to dominate our national conversations. But while media outlets and academics tend to focus on other features of faith groups worldwide – the very real and prevalent threats of religious nationalism and extremism, for example – it is nevertheless a game-changing reality that right now, in the year 2019, spiritual disbelief and religious non-affiliation are officially more popular than at any other point in human history.

How are larger numbers of nonbelievers and non-affiliated influencing countries like the United States and Canada? Or Western countries all throughout Europe? Are Middle Eastern theocracies moving any closer to secular values? What are international pro-secular and nonbelief groups doing with increasing influence and what would the goals of a global humanist movement actually be?

In This World First: Dispatches on Secular Progress Around the World, research specialist Marc Schaus interviews 23 prominent voices of international secular issues to discuss these questions. Among them, we hear from world-renowned sociologist of secularism Phil Zuckerman, spokesperson for One Law for All, Fitnah (Movement for Women's Liberation) and host of acclaimed television program Bread and Roses Maryam Namazie, co-founder of Ex-Muslims of North America Sarah Haider, co-President of the Freedom From Religion Foundation Dan Barker, Chief Executive of Humanists UK and President of Humanists International Andrew Copson, President of the American Humanist Association Rebecca Hale – and many more.
