FACULTY

Nekisha Killings MPH, IBCLC is an experienced marketer, writer, equity strategist, and international board certified lactation consultant. After spending years in consumer-packaged goods marketing and community partnership building, followed by a decade of public relations and ghostwriting, Nekisha contributed the chapter on Cultural Humility in the latest Core Curriculum for Interdisciplinary Lactation Care. She acts as equity strategist for lactation-related organizations that seek to better reach underserved communities. Recently, she co-founded Nikki & Nikki: Lactation Career Consultants, an organization dedicated to equipping aspirants of color to sit the IBCLC exam. She is a community based lactation consultant, offering no cost culturally humble support to underserved families in South Los Angeles.

DESCRIPTION

Every day, every interaction we have is colored by the inherent and implicit biases that we each carry. We see the world through lenses that are tinted by our own lived experiences, the experiences of those who are dear to us, information we have been exposed to, and systems that we live within. No one is immune. Learn how you can both identify and dismantle the subconscious impressions and beliefs about your patient base to better provide empathic and impactful care.

OBJECTIVES

1. Identify concrete ways to respect birthing parents' wishes and needs in the clinical setting and beyond
2. Describe ways to dismantle implicit bias in the healthcare setting
3. Support marginalized communities in navigating the birth system
4. List 5 ways to provide evidence based and culturally humble lactation support

CANCELLATION POLICY
