Text Message Scams: How to Identify, Report, and Help Protect Yourself

Many of us rely on text messaging for updates from our financial institution, pharmacy, and other trusted sources. But amidst all the familiar exchanges, you may see texts from unknown senders. Unfortunately, these mystery messages could be from scammers who are out to solicit payments, steal your personal information, or gain access to your bank account. Learning how to identify text message scams can help you spot red flags and steer clear of trouble.

What are common text scams? Text message scams may be automated (“robotexts”) or they may be from a real person. There are two main types to be aware of:

1. Malicious links: A malicious link text scam is when a message containing a link is sent to your phone. The text message is often “urgent,” telling you why you should click on the link right now:

You’ve won a (fantastic) prize and you need to redeem it. You need to confirm suspicious activity on your account.

You’re invited to complete a survey about a recent experience. You must confirm a package being delivered to your house.

When you click on the link, it may download malware (malicious software) to your phone. This potentially allows the scammer remote access to your phone, where they can send themselves money using a payment app already installed there. Clicking on the text message link may also take you to a spoofed website where you’ll be asked for personal details and/or a payment.

2. One-time password: A one-time password text message scam involves a phone call from someone pretending to be from a familiar organization. They may claim to be from your bank, your utility company, or even a government agency. The person or entity that’s scamming you may say there’s a problem with your account—like an overdue bill payment—and then walks you through a process to “fix” the issue. They explain the process requires dual authentication, which is when a one-time passcode is sent to your phone. Once you give the scammer that code, they can take control of your account and access any information in that account.

Text scam warnings signs to look out for:

A message announces you’ve won a major prize (monetary or other), but you don’t recall ever entering a contest or sweepstakes.

You’re asked for highly sensitive personal information to unlock an offer or avoid a penalty. The scammer may request your:

Bank account number, PIN number, credit card number, annual income, Social Security number

Other text message red flags include:

The text message contains many misspellings, bad grammar, or both. The phone number of the sender is unusually long.

The message contained in the text is not relevant to you at all.

How do I protect myself from text scams?

To help protect yourself from text message scams, use discretion when opening text messages. Should you receive an unexpected or unsolicited text, do NOT reply or click on any links in the message.
