

Leonardo Caserta is a Postdoctoral associate In the Department of Population Medicine and Diagnostic Sciences at Cornell University, Ithaca, NY, USA. After receiving his DVM degree from the São Paulo State University (UNESP), Brazil, he conducted his MS and PhD in genetics and molecular biology at the University of Campinas (UNICAMP), Brazil, with research emphasis in avian and wild mammal virology. During his PhD, he joined the Diel Lab at the South Dakota State University, later moving with the research group to the Cornell University, where he conducts research focusing on the development of recombinant vaccines and strategies for sequencing livestock viruses.