Hello,

Recently, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB), a government agency in Washington, proposed changes to the Small-Dollar Loan Regulations that it issued in 2017. Without these changes, the new regulations will prevent you from qualifying the small loans you currently use.

As you know, these small loans help you get by. They help you to make payments for rent, car loans, school supplies, and other expenses. It is important the CFPB hear from you how these loans affect your day-to-day life and that you need to be able to continue to get credit. It is also important to tell the CFPB that you can make your own financial decisions without government interference.

Without your help, you may lose access to small dollar loans. Tell the CFPB to move forward with the changes to these regulations because We Deserve Credit!

Don't sit on the sidelines, protect your access to credit by letting your voice be heard:

Hello,

Recently, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB), a government agency in Washington, proposed changes to the Small-Dollar Loan Regulations that it issued in 2017. These regulations are the government's way of controlling your financial options and your life. They will take away your right to make decisions about your money. The recently announced changes are a step in the right direction and, if passed, will protect your ability to access credit and other financial services at the financial service locations you choose to use.

No one knows better than you that your ability to get a small loan is crucial to your financial success and independence. Whether small-dollar loans help you get by on rent, car payments, school supplies, or other expenses, it is important the CFPB hear from you on how small loans impact your day-to-day life. By making your voice heard you can help to protect your access to credit.

Without your help, the government may take away access to the credit options you want. Tell the CFPB to move forward with their proposed changes to these regulations because We Deserve Credit!
