GSDs: Loyal, Loving, and… Master Criminals?

By Dana M. and Emre D.

We all know the GSD checklist: loyal, protective, dedicated, and deeply loving. But there is a catch. If you don't convince them that you are the smartest one in the household, they will absolutely, take over.

Just ask us about our "foster failure," Gigi. We fostered her for a few months in 2020 and—well, you know how that goes—we adopted her. She's a feisty, loving girl who keeps us on our toes every single day.

Recently, we got married in a tropical location where, sadly, Gigi couldn't join us. She spent her days at the Wag Hotel in San Francisco, frolicking with other dogs and snoozing in her room at night. To keep her calm and settled, the staff was instructed to give her a gabapentin capsule inside a savory Pill Pocket. Everything was going swimmingly.

Or so we thought.

We got a call from the staff the day after the wedding. They had caught Gigi on camera performing a tactical operation: she had carefully dug the gabapentin out of the Pill Pocket, eaten the treat, and disposed of the pill in the drain in her room.

Suspicious, the staff removed the grate and found a hidden cache of every single night's dosage! She had tucked them away perfectly, leaving no evidence of her "non-compliance."

The staff knew the pills weren't a medical necessity, but they had to call just to say one thing, "GSDs are so darn smart!"
