Seventeen and pregnant. Junior in high school. Mom living in another state. Dad in the military and deployed. Boyfriend on again, off again. Not what one would describe as a stable situation in which to bring a child into the world.

But God.

Mom made the initial call to Daybreak and was upset when told, we typically don't perform ultrasounds before seven weeks. Knowing that, and when the client walked in with her mother, I was anticipating a difficult situation.

But God.

I had a wonderful conversation with this precious young lady. Tears streamed down her face as we talked about her options. Her eyes seemed to brighten as I explained the many ways adoption can work. She professed to be a Christian. The meeting ended with indecision continuing.

But God.

A week later after learning my client had canceled her ultrasound appointment at Daybreak, I called to check on her. Knowing it was school hours, I was surprised when she answered. In hushed tones, she said she would be going to the state of Virginia "to take care of it." She immediately followed with, "but I want to do the abortion recovery class!" I happened to have a flyer for the next class sitting on the desk and I told her I would text it to her. Hanging up, I was sad for her and her baby.

But God.

Two weeks later, I received a text from my client saying she had decided to continue with the pregnancy and wanted to do Baby Bucks. Hallelujah!!! I have continued to check on her and she says she's doing well. What a blessing to see the God of impossibilities move in a young girl's heart~ to change what seems impossible into a hope and a future.
