

Community influencers support SEL

Six in 10 “community influencers” support social and emotional learning (SEL), and even higher percentages support key aspects of SEL, such as safety and student engagement, according to a recent survey by the National Association of State Boards of Education. Respondents were considered “community influencers” based on their reported participation in politics, news media, and community organizations.

Teaching the basics of reading, writing, math, science and social studies

Ensuring students feel safe and secure at school

Providing high-quality education opportunities for all students across the state

Preparing students for the real world

Preparing students for jobs and careers

Engaging students in their learning

A positive school culture and climate

Supporting positive mental health and addressing needs

Educating the whole child

Promoting health and wellness

Raising the bar for academic achievement

Closing the achievement gap and improving outcomes for students of color and from low-income backgrounds

Social and emotional learning

Personalized instruction to motivate and challenge students

Culturally relevant instruction in schools

casel.org

Source: Gauging Support for Social and Emotional Skill Building in School, NASBE.
<http://www.nasbe.org/policy-update/gauging-support-for-social-and-emotional-skill-building/>