Concepts, Provocative Questions, and Social Justice

Hosted by David Bass

"Why are we studying this?" is a great question that humanities teachers are asked daily. While we generally have a good answer, building a conceptual framework can offer depth to both students and teachers. By developing conceptual and provocative questions, teachers hook students to content by building powerful connections between what is studied in class and the real lives of students. The lens of social justice is at the heart of much of our history and our literature. During this PD Short, participants will be looking to unlock access to those connections by introducing a conceptual approach that will become a habit of mind, one that may change your classroom for the rest of your career.

Audience: Middle and High School Humanities Teachers
