

Lila Garfield on the Bonimot Tzedek workshop with JCUA (Jewish Council of Urban Affairs)

The joint-JCUA event on economic justice was a positive experience for me because I left with a better idea of how to talk to people in my community, particularly people who can vote, about voting for and supporting the fair tax initiative. It was also interesting to meet other Jewish teens and it is always great to spend time with people from Tavor, working for a more equitable world.

Also, it was interesting to learn about segregation in Chicago and how the fair tax initiative would affect communities that are redlined and economically oppressed. We got to connect those forms of oppression and their histories to our histories as Jews and how we have contributed to the problem as well as how we can help now.
