Biddeford Coworking is a dynamic workspace located in the Pepperell Mill in Biddeford, Maine. Designed to support remote workers, freelancers, and startups, it offers a variety of flexible options, including floating desks, dedicated desks, private offices, and day passes. Members have access to high-speed internet, meeting rooms, ergonomic workstations, and a kitchen for your morning coffee.

Biddeford Coworking is not only a shared workspace, but it's a community built on organic connections and a welcoming atmosphere. Founded by Marc Feldman, who spent 35 years in the grocery wholesale industry, the space was inspired by his observations of how students naturally gathered in common areas to collaborate and work. Having experienced remote work himself, Marc was inspired to create a space that would provide an alternative to remote work, particularly for professionals looking to get out of home offices or basement workspaces.

The sense of community at Biddeford Coworking is driven by a simple philosophy of friendliness and presence. Members naturally connect over lunch, casual conversations, and shared experiences. Some have been part of the space for nearly a decade, forming lasting relationships that extend beyond work. Marc takes pride in fostering an environment where members not only share office space but also build friendships.

Biddeford Coworking recently underwent a rebranding, allowing Marc to shape the space's future while staying true to its roots as a welcoming and flexible work environment. Biddeford Coworking thrives on face-to-face interactions, proving that sometimes the best collaboration tool is simply being present and open to connection.
