Special Report: Legislative Term Limits

This information was published before the 2018 legislative session convened. With the end of session at hand and the filing deadline for legislators to decide if they are going to seek another term, the information is again relevant and timely.

The 2018 legislative session is the final session for five members of the House of Representatives and four members of the Senate. Elected to these seats in 2010, and reelected in 2012-2016, each of these individuals have served the full four terms (eight sessions) allowed under South Dakota term limits.

Those facing term limits have several choices.

1. They can seek election to the other legislative body – this works best if the person filling that seat(s) is willing to switch or, better yet, has reached their own term limit.
2. Stay out for a term or two and run to regain the seat which would restart the term limit clock. This can prove to be awkward since the person who filled the seat is eligible to run for their second term. But what the heck, this isn't a game of "hide and seek" and there is no base.

South Dakota uses a system that technically has two people representing each legislative district in the House of Representatives* (and one Senator from each district). To be clear, House members who have reached their term limit cannot run for the "other seat" and stay in the House; they must run for the Senate or leave the legislature.

*There are two legislative districts that have been divided and have one person elected from each half of the entire district – Districts 26 & 28 have House districts 26A/26B and 28A/28B, respectively.

Below you will find a listing of the legislators who are term limited and the situation of the other legislators from that district.
