Resident Voting Rights: Who Can Vote And How?

Read More

Cona Elder Law PLLC

Recent efforts to curb voter fraud and restrict mail-in voting have created new challenges in exercising the right to vote in national, state, and local elections. These challenges are even more pronounced for residents in long-term care facilities, who already face practical barriers to voting that can prevent them from participating in an election. However, it is important to remember that living in a nursing home or long-term care facility does not take away a person's fundamental right to vote. As election season draws closer, long-term care providers should review their obligations to assist residents in this process and be prepared to ensure that their residents can freely exercise their right to vote.

A resident can walk comfortably down a hallway and still struggle when the task changes.

Someone calls their name and they turn. They carry a cup while navigating a doorway. They walk through a busy dining room while listening to a conversation.

These are ordinary moments, but they place additional demands on both the brain and body. Researchers refer to the change that occurs when someone performs a physical task while managing a cognitive task as dual-task cost. Studies have shown that adding a cognitive task while walking can affect gait speed, stride consistency and stability, all of which can contribute to fall risk.
