

GRAND CANYON CONSERVANCY

This year's Celebration of Art carries a little more meaning. As we come together to honor Grand Canyon through art, we're also coming together to care for the place and community that make it all possible.

What Visitors Need to Know

A major flash flood on August 29 caused significant damage to the Transcanyon Waterline, Grand Canyon's primary water delivery system. As a result, there is no water pumping to the South Rim. While crews work to repair the water system, Grand Canyon National Park is taking significant steps to conserve water.

We've made significant changes to Celebration of Art to minimize our impact on the park's water supply, including:

- Moving lodging for artists, guests, and supporting staff to Tusayan.
- Moving select programming to Tusayan or online.
- Using portable restrooms and hand-washing facilities for South Rim events.
- Preparing event food off-site in Tusayan.

You Can Help By:

- Bringing plenty of water with you to last throughout your visit.
- Using hand-washing stations instead of sinks whenever available.
- Using portable toilets throughout the South Rim.
- Following posted water-use restrictions and instructions.
- Being prepared to adjust your plans as conditions change.

Did You Know?

Grand Canyon is home to nearly 2,000 people, many of whom are working hard to conserve water while continuing to welcome visitors. Please be patient with the people who live and work here.

Lodging inside the park is currently closed. South Rim campgrounds are open, but no water is available.

Scan for more information:

Thank you for helping care for Grand Canyon while the park recovers.