

Cindy Esquivias graduated from Mount St. Mary's University in Los Angeles with a Master of Science in Education, and CSU East Bay with a Master of Science in Speech and Language Pathology. Following a short career as a high-school English teacher, Cindy was inspired to pursue a career in Speech-Language Pathology, as she realized how important early intervention was—especially when working in low-SES communities. She has a strong passion for working with pediatric populations with speech, language, feeding, and swallowing disorders. Her areas of interest include early intervention, family-centered care, pediatric dysphagia, bilingualism, and literacy. She has experience working in private practice settings, home-based early intervention, as well as medical settings--both outpatient and inpatient. Additionally, Cindy has served as a lecturer for CSU East Bay and San Jose State University in their Communicative Disorders and Sciences departments. Cindy is currently based in the Bay Area where she provides outpatient speech services at Lucile Packard Children's Hospital, Stanford.
