

As public health environmentalists seeking health and justice, we are called to: 1) increase our understanding of the underlying social and economic inequities which deny justice to low income communities and communities of color, 2) increase our vigilance over the systems that protect health and equity, and 3) ensure that science is translational with the goal of improving health outcomes for everyone.

History reminds us, even now as we watch it unfold, that individual actions build a united voice. The time is now for each of us to stand against racism for the betterment of society, health, and justice for all.
