Social Studies:

Ever wonder what happens to you when you go to sleep? Or wonder what your dreams actually mean? Students in Mrs. Pepler's psychology classes have been spending the last few weeks exploring the answers to these questions as they study the different states of consciousness. Part of their exploration has included keeping a sleep and dream journal to use for self analysis and reflection. Students have also been researching various sleep disorders and prepared presentations designed to answer the question "How can I improve my sleep?" -- By Lori Pepler

English:

As we move toward winter break, 10th grade CP English students are working their way through Lord of the Flies by William Golding. This is a really exciting unit that allows students to discover and unfold the elements of our humanity that are susceptible to manipulation. We spend each class discussing how our fears are often the driving force behind our actions, choices, and reactions. We discuss how the controlled society we live in, full of everything we need to maintain our health and happiness, is what allows most humans to act in a humane manner. Students are beginning to discover through our reading, however, that once people begin to feel threatened that something they have will be taken from them, they begin to act in a more natural, savage, manner. Through the reading of Golding's work, students are learning a significant amount about identifying important details within a whole text, as well as identifying significant facets within themselves. This will conclude in a summative essay. -- By Carly Tutolo
