

On November 27, Sport for Life will be presenting our final Long-Term Athlete Development webinar for 2018: Making Multisport Work. Recently the concept of multisport participation has gotten some exciting media attention with leadership from our friends at Active for Life and great examples from Canadian sport organizations. There are lots of research studies backing up the concept, and multisport is built into the Long-Term Athlete Development key factors of Physical Literacy, Specialization, Developmental Age, and System Alignment. So, if everybody knows about it, why isn't multisport participation the norm for young, developing athletes across Canada?

Here's where you can make a difference. We are looking for community- to provincial/territorial-level practitioners who have been making multisport work, to present on the November 27 webinar. Ideally, we will share some inspirational successes and get new perspectives on the challenges. If you've been making multisport work in your community or program, please contact Sarah Blézy at Sport for Life (sarah@sportforlife.ca) with a short 50-words-or-less description of why you should help present the webinar. We will select a few of the most interesting and help you from there! Take the challenge and apply by October 15, 2018.
