From the Principal's Desk

I have been on leave this past week for Paternity and it has given me some time to reflect and to watch my own children as they engage with Distance Learning. It has been quite interesting to see the different teacher styles and to see how one child's reaction to the Distance Learning environment is so different from my other children. Watching my kids navigate their learning independently and with such perseverance and grace has been inspiring. It made me realize the extraordinary lessons that our students are learning through all of this.

The level of independent learning that we are expecting from our students can seem scary at times, but in the long run, I feel confident that it will put them in a much better position to be successful in University and beyond. Our teachers are there to support them and guide them, but there is an expectation that students stay on track and keep up with all their learning. This is not easy for many of our students, but they are getting better and better and they are doing it!

Another important evolution in our students' learning is with the assessment environment. The shift that teachers have had to make when assessing students, knowing there is a need to minimize easily "Googleable" tests and quizzes, has been a joy to watch. Our students are able to demonstrate a higher level of critical thinking, creativity, and resourcefulness thanks, in part, to some of these assessments.

Of course, I am not saying that I want to stay in Distance Learning forever, but when you look closely, there are some incredible benefits that our students are experiencing. Plus, they get to sleep in while they do it! As always, please reach out to your teenager's teacher, counselor, Associate Principal, or Principal if you feel that he or she may need some additional support.

CNG COMMUNITY NEWS

Last week we asked students to sign up for Distance Learning Clubs (DLCs). These are completely voluntary clubs that happen on Thursdays during FLEX time (2:00-2:30) and are designed to help students CONNECT more with their teachers and peers in a fun space of common passions and interests. We hope you encouraged students to sign up and attend one of these clubs as we feel it will help their overall Distance Learning experience be more enjoyable!
