Stewardship Manager Scott Parrish likes helping Corteva Agriscience make the world a better place. "It's cool being part of a company that is vital in the fight against world hunger," he says. Scott does this by helping licensees meet all the requirements to be good stewards of Corteva's technologies.

Scott didn't come from a farming background, but while trying to find his niche in business school, he discovered agricultural economics and something clicked. "I liked learning using real world examples like the food supply chain, so I decided that was the path I wanted to take."

When Scott joined Corteva nearly 10 years ago – after more than a decade at an agricultural audit firm – he was focused on germplasm and trait sales reporting. Today, he works with licensees on grower licensing, point-of-sale reporting, reconciliation and compliance, plus helping them meet compliance requirements for logo and language usage on bags, tags and print materials – everything found on the www.PowertoPromote.com website. "I enjoy helping customers successfully meet their contractual requirements," Scott says. "Success for the customer equals success for Corteva Agriscience."

Scott's previous roles help him guide customers when they have questions on reporting, labeling, agreements and more. "I've been on both sides of the table," says Scott. "I've performed audits and I've been audited. This allows me to help customers because I have experienced what they are experiencing."

When working with licensees, Scott provides lots of guidance to help ensure they have a good experience working with Corteva. "If we can make their job easier, it is one less thing they have to worry about because we know everyone is extremely busy throughout the season," Scott says.
