

The Biden Administration: Who Will Sit in Key Positions?

As a former U.S. Senator and a former Vice President, President-Elect Biden is likely to look to form a cabinet that understands the norms and rules of Washington and one that can carry the White House messages and priorities to Capitol Hill as well as throughout the stakeholder community. While the role of “insiders” is often derided, Biden’s team will likely place a premium on individuals that have a fundamental understanding of the policies, as well as working knowledge on how to work with Congress. Biden has just two months to make the calls on who will carry-out the day-to-day management of the bureaucracy. While much of the groundwork has been laid to expedite the process, it remains a work in progress.

In any transition, individuals seeking to secure a role is always a given, but the importance of working with a Republican Senate to secure confirmations and subsequent legislative agreements places a heightened premium on the selection of Cabinet nominees that could secure swift Senate approval. If this proves accurate, then former or current Senators would seem to be favorites for key positions. The cabinet is expected to be diverse but moderate in its policy perspectives. At the same time, it is highly plausible that the Biden White House will create a climate czar to manage any initiatives to bring the U.S. back into a role domestically and internationally to advance climate resiliency. For now, some of the names being floated include:

- Michelle Flournoy, former Under Secretary of Defense, and Senators Tammy Duckworth and Jack Reed for Secretary of Defense
- Roger Ferguson, Chief Executive Officer, TIAA, Lael Brainard, Federal Reserve Governor for Secretary of Treasury, and Sarah Bloom Raskin, Professor, Duke and former Federal Reserve Governor and Deputy Secretary of Treasury
