During her time at Lowell High, she learned a lot about the community and was surrendered by diversity that represented her and the community. That was one of the proudest moments that she had during High School. During her time in school, she mainly focused on academics and enjoyed time with her friends, to whom she still talks to until this day.

Faradeh is one of the students out of many that had completed her senior years during the COVID-19 pandemic. Instead of giving up, she continues to finish school and go on to college. She went to the University of Massachusetts Lowell for one year, studying Bioengineering, then transferred to Middlesex Community College to study Liberal Arts, graduating in May 2023.

Faradeh is young, but she has the hope and the leadership style that inspire many other young people in our community. Since she moved to Lowell, she love this city. She says, "This is where it makes me feel comfortable, I feel like I see people on the street, and I know them" It just shows how the small community is and that "There's a lot to like about Lowell"
