Did you know volunteers often simply watch less TV than non-volunteers?

Nathan Dietz, research director of the Do Good Institute, recently shared this insight on volunteering in the United States. Despite common perceptions of time constraints, Dietz's research indicates that volunteers' daily lives are much like those of non-volunteers, aside from the fact that they tend to be more active. He highlighted the personal benefits of volunteering, including expanding one's social circle and feeling good about helping others. This is especially true in Highlands, where individual contributions have a significant impact on the close-knit community.

In Highlands, organizations like The Literacy & Learning Center thrive on volunteerism. TL&LC provides free programs, from early childhood education to adult literacy.

The Center's commitment relies heavily on dedicated volunteers who give their time and talents. Assisting in group activities, clerical work, or events, TL&LC volunteers directly enrich lives and foster a love of learning for all ages.

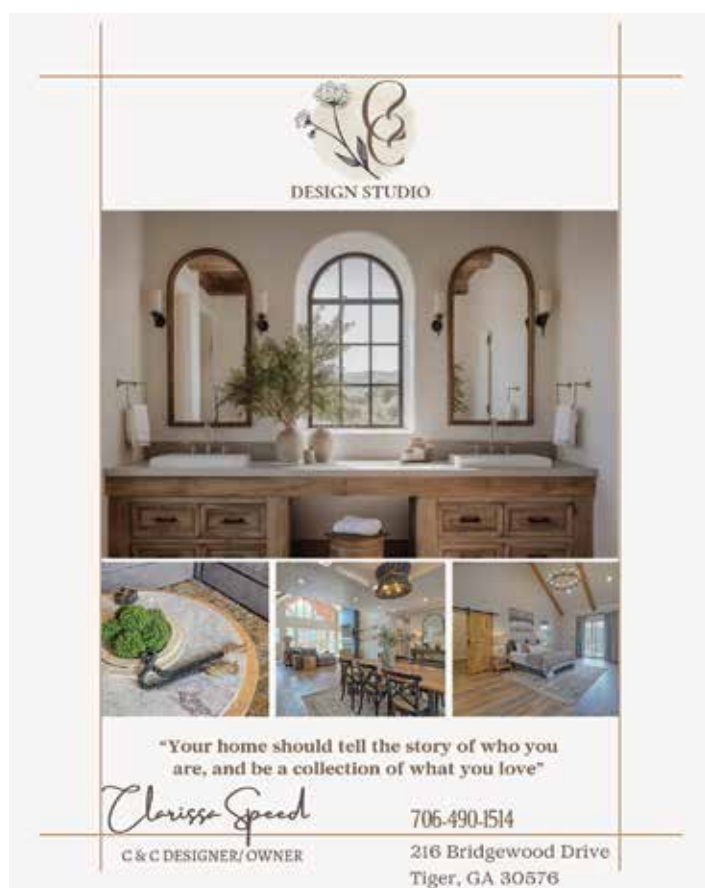

Many potential volunteers might hesitate, unsure if they possess the specific skills needed for an educational environment.

However, at TL&LC, there are numerous ways to contribute, regardless of one's background! Volunteers can spend time listening to children read, providing invaluable one-on-one literacy support, or assisting summer camp leaders in setting up and overseeing group activities. Preparation for events and helping guests check in offers another opportunity that also comes along with free admission. Every hour of support makes a difference, and the Center provides guidance to ensure volunteers feel comfortable and confident in their roles, whether clerical or educational.

Volunteering at TL&LC supports a vital community resource and offers a unique opportunity to connect with neighbors, learn new skills, and experience making a tangible difference. As Dietz noted, volunteering creates a powerful sense of connection to something larger than oneself, which is especially impactful in Highlands. If individuals seek to give back and become more involved, TL&LC welcomes their support.
