TORAH READING

Parshas Vayetzei	Page: 124
Haftorah Vayetzei	Page: 1137

“They lived happily ever after”. Many Disney films end with that comforting expression. It is a fantasy that many people attach themselves to and wonder why their life is not perfectly happy, stress free, or “happily ever after”. Real life is quite different. It is not to suggest that real life must be sad and tragic. There are countless reasons for anyone to choose to be happy no matter the circumstances of that individual's life. However, the journey of life does make some twists and turns and some of these turns are on treacherous roads. A person of faith does not have the illusion that his life will be perfect or always happy simply because of their religious observance or piety.

As we study the Book of Bereishes there is no lack of examples of righteous people committed to G-d that had a life full of hardships and tragedy. Avraham had the challenge of a son Yishmael and Yitzchak had a son Esav. Yaakov had to escape to a foreign land as his brother wanted to kill him only because he listened to the wishes of his mother. His father-in-law swindled him multiple times. Upon his return to the land of Israel (which G-d commanded) his daughter Dina gets kidnapped and raped. Yosef, the beloved son of Yaakov is sold as a slave by his brothers and taken to a dungeon in a foreign land. In this week's Parsha, we learn about extraordinary altruism of Rachel. She is rewarded with many years of childlessness and eventually dies during the childbirth of her second son. Her husband buries her not in the ancestral family Machpeilah Cave but on the side of the road. One can reasonably ask, how is it that the righteous suffer on such a magnitude? After leading devout lives full of piety and declaring their commitment to G-d and His ways, is this remotely fair?

Although we may not be on the level of the Patriarchs and Matriarchs listed in Sefer Bereishis/Genesis, we have all our share of sadness and tragedy. Last week in Jerusalem, a young 16-year-old boy in Jerusalem went to study in Yeshiva in the morning. He was killed at a bus stop at 7:30 am by a bomb planted by a terrorist. His funeral was at 4:00 pm that afternoon. Imagine, parents, sending a child to yeshiva around 7:00 am and burying him at 4:00 pm the very same day. How do we begin to reconcile such events with the belief in a Benevolent and Just G-d?

Sefer Berishes/Genesis teaches us that a pious life is not always aligned with a life that has no anguish or stress. The truly pious anticipate there will be problems in this world. As King David wrote in Psalms, גַם בַּיַּלְךְ בְּגַיאָה צְלָמֹת לְאִירָא רָע בַּיְתָה עַמְּדָי. This is translated as “though I walk in the valley of death, I fear no evil for You are with me.” It's important to note that G-d does not promise that there will be no death will occur. Rather, he promises, he will fear no evil for “You are with me”. That in a small sentence is the life of the devout and committed. They do not expect they are entitled to a problem-free life. They understand that the journey of life will come with its share of pain and anguish. They also know that even during those dark moments they are not alone for He is with them. When a person is truly able to internalize the notion of “You are with me”, he actually in a different way may “live happily ever after”.

Have a peaceful Shabbos,

Rabbi Yaakov Fisch

Four Part Mini-Series
With Rebbetzin Rena Schochet:

Prophets, Prophecies, and History

What should we learn from the seeming historical repetitions in the Books of Neviim? We learn about the wars, how we settled and then there are the breakdowns between prophets, judges, and kings? What are the deeper meanings in these seemingly historical, almost predictable, uncertainties? We will plumb these depths together.
