A Year Later

Madison Negroes Still Face Entrapping Circle

By JOHNNY CRAY

A year ago today the city was shocked with the news that a Madison Negro was the victim of a hate crime.

The incident was reported to the police, who immediately launched an investigation. The case was eventually closed due to lack of information.

Today, the situation remains unchanged. Madison Negroes still face the same problems as they did a year ago.

John McCall, chairman of the Madison County Democratic Committee, expressed concern over the situation.

"This is a year later, and we still have the same problems," he said.

The Madison Police Department has not made any significant progress in the investigation.

"We have not been able to find any leads," said Chief of Police, John Smith.

The public is urged to provide any information they may have to the police.

"Any tips you may have could help us solve this case," said Smith.

Meanwhile, the victim's family is still mourning the loss of their loved one.

"We are still in disbelief," said the victim's mother, Mrs. James Brown.

The case remains unsolved, and the family is seeking justice.

"We want the truth to come out," said Mrs. Brown.

The community is urged to keep the case in their thoughts.

"We need your support," said McCall. "This is a tough case, but we will not give up until we find the truth."
