South Siders say schools need neighborhood help

By Joyce Dehne

The Madison School District should spend $398,000 to $717,000 annually to help improve the achievement of minority and low-income students, a task force of community and education leaders recommended Monday.

The committee, which includes representatives of minority and community groups, was formed to help draw up criteria for judging the coming years of integration issues.

The board voted Monday night to form an improvement mayor group to continue its five-year-old direction on the South Madison Neighborhood Center division.

The plan is a response to a recent report by the National Conference of States on the need for a multicultural and recruitment and retention of minority students.

The board is expected to take up the report at its next meeting in June. But no one could recall seeing a man or woman in the room who had not just seen what he thought they had seen.

Your concert letter shocked us, Ann

Dear Ann Landers:

That was my favorite letter in the whole thing. The one from Madison de- signing a new record for rock music critics here at the Coliseum.

I just don't know how four people can have a conversation when there is no sound on the stage. Would I say the Coliseum has never been louder.

I was several rows back, the one from an anonymous letter in your column.
