Urban League Looks Out for Minorities

The National Urban League has adopted a new urbanism in community development. Two recent developments are of prime importance to Madison, which has for years been one of the main cities in the nation for the purpose of resolving the problems of minority groups. One of these is the appointment of Charles Hill, the former executive director of the National Urban League, as the new executive director of the Madison Urban League. The other is the formation of the Milwaukee Urban League.

The Milwaukee Urban League was formed to provide a forum for the discussion of issues relating to minority groups in Wisconsin. It is the result of a long struggle by the Milwaukee Urban League and the National Urban League to bring about a more equitable distribution of resources among minority groups.

The Milwaukee Urban League has been active in a number of ways. It has provided funds for community projects, such as the development of a community center in Milwaukee. It has also been active in legal battles, such as the case of the Milwaukee Urban League vs. the city of Milwaukee, in which the Milwaukee Urban League sued the city to require it to provide adequate funding for minority groups.

The National Urban League has been active in a number of ways as well. It has provided funding for community projects, such as the development of a community center in Madison. It has also been active in legal battles, such as the case of the National Urban League vs. the city of Madison, in which the National Urban League sued the city to require it to provide adequate funding for minority groups.

The National Urban League has been successful in its efforts to bring about a more equitable distribution of resources among minority groups. It has been able to provide funding for community projects, such as the development of community centers and schools, and it has been able to bring about legal victories, such as the case of the National Urban League vs. the city of Madison.

The Milwaukee Urban League and the National Urban League have both been successful in their efforts to bring about a more equitable distribution of resources among minority groups. They have been able to provide funding for community projects, and they have been able to bring about legal victories. The future of these efforts, however, remains to be seen.
