

SEPTEMBER Asset of the Month:

The Importance of Parent Involvement in Schooling

Research shows that youth whose parents are actively involved in their schooling are more engaged in school. Students are less likely to be delinquent or drop out, and more likely to achieve higher grades and standardized test scores. Studies show that students from poor families whose parents are highly involved with their education do about as well as students from wealthier families.

Joyce Epstein of the National Network of Partnership Schools developed a framework for understanding six different kinds of parent involvement:

1. Parenting: families establish home environments that support children's learning
2. Communicating: families and schools engage in effective two-way communications about student expectations and progress
3. Volunteering: parents directly support the classroom or school
4. Learning at home: families help students with homework and school-related decision-making and planning
5. Decision making: parents are involved in school decisions
6. Community collaboration: community services are resources integrated to strengthen schools and families

Parents whose schedules don't allow volunteering can still support their children's academic success through parenting, communication, and learning at home.

Unfortunately, Project Cornerstone's 2017 survey revealed that only 47% of 4th-6th graders and 30% of 7th-12th graders reported that their parents are involved in their education. To help raise awareness of this important asset, September is Parent Involvement in Schooling month in Silicon Valley. The following discussion topics can help you talk with young people about ways that their parents can be involved with their education:

- What do your parents do that let you know they care about your education? What could they do to be more supportive?
- What information about school is important to share with your family? What kind of information would you prefer not to share?
- What advice would you give a family who's new to your school?
- Some workplaces have a "Shadow Day," where youth follow an employee and learn what their day is like. If you could have a Shadow Day at school where your parents followed you throughout your day, what you want them to see?

This article was provided courtesy of Project Cornerstone's Asset-a-Month program. For more information, visit www.projectcornerstone.org.

Activities

The activities below are a starting point to help create greater parent involvement in schooling.

For families...

- Make a point of staying in touch with your children's teachers, even if your kids aren't having problems. Most teachers are glad to communicate with you after school hours by telephone or email.
- Make sure that your kids have a clean and organized location to do their homework, and help them establish a regular schedule for schoolwork.
- Instead of asking "How was your day?" ask open-ended questions like "What was the best part of your day?" and "Did any of your classmates do anything funny?"
- Help your children maintain a positive attitude about school. Make sure they know that you will be their advocate to resolve any problems or challenges that they encounter.

Resources

- Project Cornerstone offers parent engagement programs in schools throughout Silicon Valley. These programs are offered in both Spanish and English. Parents are provided with an opportunity to build developmental assets in their own children as well as other students in their classroom. Parents share asset-building stories and lead activities and discussions. The Spanish-language Los Dichos program opens new doors for Spanish-speaking parents. While supporting their children's education they are building greater positive ethnic identity and cultural experience throughout their schools. For more information on other cultural programs available, contact Project Cornerstone at (408) 351-6482 or info@projectcornerstone.org.
- Families in Schools is a nonprofit organization whose mission is to involve parents and communities in their children's education to achieve lifelong success. Their web site offers a wealth of resources in English and Spanish to help families, communities, and schools effectively increase parent involvement. For more information, visit <http://www.familiesinschools.org>.
- Joyce Epstein's framework for parent involvement can help administrators, teachers, and parents understand the different ways that families can be involved and provide a starting point for creating effective parent engagement at a school. The framework and links to information about practices, challenges, and results can be found at http://www.csos.jhu.edu/P2000/nnps_model/school/sixtypes.htm.
- The San José Unified School District's Office of Parent Education and Involvement offers training, workshops, classes, conferences, college and career nights, and special events. For more information call (408) 535-6405.