Positing the occurrence of a "Confessional Revival" in the 19th century presumes that there had been a loss of attention to confessions. Such was certainly the case in the Lutheran churches of the 19th century. The revival of interest in the documents of the Book of Concord was not universal, and was not met without criticism.

This conference looks back at two theologians, Andreas Rudelbach and Theodosius Harnack, who argued in favor of renewed attention to the Lutheran Confessions. We have commissioned translations of their writings, so that a new discussion about the role of the Confessions can occur, resting on a broader foundation than previously available to the English-speaking theologian.

Translations will be distributed to participants in advance of the conference, and the "workshop" time will be dedicated to group study of these "new" texts.

Andreas Rudelbach (1792-1862) translated the Augsburg Confession and its Apology into Danish and served as a preacher in Copenhagen before being called to serve as Superintendent in Glachau (Saxony). Rudelbach was active in multiple Lutheran theological journals in his day, and known for his critique of Union churches, work on the relationship of church to state, and writings on the relationship of the Lutheran church to the Lutheran Confession.

Theodosius Harnack (1817-1889) taught Practical Theology in Dorpat (today Tartu, Estonia) and Erlangen. There he belonged to the renowned Erlangen Theology Faculty but opposed Johannes von Hofmann's theory of the atonement. His research on the theology of Martin Luther (2 volumes, 1862 and 1886) is among the most important Luther research of the 19th century. His son was the famous theologian Adolf von Harnack.
