

Medical School Welcomes Undergraduate Clinical Summer Interns

During the past six weeks the Robert Wood Johnson Medical School Office of Admissions hosted 21 undergraduate students from across the country for its annual Summer Clinical Internship Program. Coordinated by Mary Beth Green, participants had the opportunity to shadow 18 clinical faculty members in 16 specialties who graciously shared their time and talent while hosting students uniquely interested in their specific areas of medicine. Students were encouraged to keep the hours of the clinicians throughout the six week program in order to get a real sense of the specialty, the issues in patient care and the practice of medicine.

Additional faculty members facilitated a lunchtime seminar series hosted three days each week to complement the clinical experiences. The Summer Clinical Internship Program culminated with presentations the students made to their peers, preceptors, Carol Terregino, MD, senior associate dean for education, and Liesel Copeland, PhD, director of admissions and medical education, on topics selected and researched with the guidance of the faculty preceptors.

The students were made to feel part of the team at both the medical school and Robert Wood Johnson University Hospital. One student wrote in her thank you to the physician she shadowed, "You have truly inspired me to be the kind of physician that does anything and everything in her power to connect with her patients and let them know they are being heard and understood."

Another student wrote: "Shadowing at RWJUH was an exciting experience from beginning to end. Overall, it has reaffirmed my desire to pursue a career in medicine."
