“The History of Gala Day”

Gala Day was first conceived and presented to the Imperial Council in 1944. The original idea was not conceived as Gala Day, but as the Deputy’s Day and was given the name Gala Day by the Imperial Council. Gala Day was the brainchild of Daughter Flora Watkins and Noble Claude Watkins. At the time of its inception, Noble Watkins was the Imperial Deputy of the Desert of Indiana. He approached the Imperil Potentate and Imperial Council with the idea of declaring a day to honor the Deputies of the Deserts throughout the Imperial Domain. The idea was first met with many objections in the Council by a very conservative block of officers of the Shrine. The Imperial Potentate, Noble Raymond W. Jackson No. 64 (1939-1955), “A Man for the Hour”, embraced the thought that the Deputies worked for the Council all year and deserved the tribute. He also reasoned that the local Temples could make money for charity. Upon giving the idea its approval, the imperial Council decreed that the event should be known as “Gala Day”, and that the Deputy of the Desert must oversee all arrangements and business pertaining to the events. The Council ruled that each Temple in the Desert would be allowed the opportunity to serve as hosts, with the initial event to be held in 1945. Gala Day as we know it today is a joint celebration between the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine and the Daughters of the A.E.A.O.N.M.S.

This is why we Celebrate Gala Day!

History of Eatonville

Eatonville, the first incorporated all-black city in the nation, also is important in African-American history as home of Zora Neale Hurston, the Harlem Renaissance writer known for her novel Their Eyes Were Watching God. As a result, the Zora Neal Hurston National Museum of Fine Arts hosts an annual festival in Eatonville, a still-thriving town. Now a suburb of Orlando, Eatonville no longer is a backwoods town in a rural area, as described in Hurston's novels. Eatonville remains, however, a cultural gem – one that beckons you to visit.

Thank you for your Service!!!
