Dear Members and Friends,

Well, after a particularly brilliant President’s letter was lost to cyber interference, here is my second offering. Even though my writing muse is on break, I will try my best.

The first half of our fiscal year was fraught with many Covid-19 interruptions, and we, like many other organizations had to look for new and creative ways to accomplish our goals and objectives. This included offering a “Restart and Complete” program for organizations that were closed down last March, continuing our retro gallery shows on Sunday and Wednesday, and producing our Friday evening, subscription music programs on YouTube.

Our next steps were to continue and expand our ART BOX program to provide 1,000 art boxes for our county’s third graders. These were distributed through the Board of Education with major assistance from the La Plata Target. We partnered with the Charles County Rotary for a public art project with the Neighborhood Creative Arts Center at the Dorchester Community Center in La Plata. In November, we approved over $40,000 in Community Arts Development grant applications, and look forward to developing a virtual Theater Arts Education program. We will also be supporting our High School Theatre Production endeavors and looking for more ideas to continue our support of the arts in Charles County. If you have any ideas contact us.

We hope that all of you were safe and secure during the recent Thanksgiving Holidays, and that Providence will provide you with an equally safe and secure Christmas time for you and your families.

Happy New Year real soon!

Sincerely,

Robert

ArtLAB Goes Virtual

On November 20, 2020, Charles County Arts Alliance (CCAA) Administrative Specialist Mary Whitmore attended, ArtsLAB 2020, presented by the Maryland Citizens for the Arts (MCA). ArtsLAB is a professional development symposium and travels to different parts of Maryland each year. ArtsLAB is a place where artists, arts professionals, advocates and more, come together to discuss current issues and concerns facing the arts sector.

Like many other programs this year, ArtsLAB was held virtually. The theme was Decolonizing the Arts. The sessions covered a Legislative Outlook, Arts & Entertainment Districts and Local Arts Advocacy, and a panel discussion on Decolonizing Artistic and Hiring Practices.

Each session was presented by highly skilled and experienced leaders from across the state. Presenters offered a unique perspective into their experiences, allowing attendees to consider new applications to integrate in their respective communities. Some key takeaways from the event included: suggestions to “keep arts advocacy fair, just, and equitable” by creating a statewide artist database, making space for regular conversations with artists, and A&E districts providing affordable spaces to support artists and organizations; potential local programs promoting local heritage through a “cross-generational arts effort”; and ways to decolonize hiring practices by making public rejections of racism, allowing any member of the community to participate on hiring committees, and ensuring boards are accountable to their organization’s mission.

While these takeaways barely scratch the surface of Mary’s first experience at ArtsLAB, the CCAA is excited to integrate all her learnings as we move forward promoting all the arts in Charles County.

CCAA - 2nd Fridays

The Charles County Arts Alliance goes live the 2nd Friday of each month in its new virtual lecture/performance series. Each month a different arts discipline is highlighted and features artists and programs from and with connections to Charles County and southern Maryland.

Carly Harvey kicked off our first program in November. Her interview was enlightening and entertaining as she made direct connections to Blues music and Afro-Indigenous culture and sang her own new song created as a response to the country’s current Social Justice movement. Click here to see the program.

Log on to our YouTube channel, Charles County Arts Alliance, every 2nd Friday at 7:00 pm. Click HERE to subscribe to the channel today!

The Bag Lady
By Tracy Morgan

The smell from the room summoned me inside. It was like looking at an apple seed floating a large vat of milk. Her small frame was almost swallowed up by the white linens placed about her hospital bed. Her dusty, gray strands of hair that had been weakened from a lack of attention were sprawled against her pillow, searching for a place to rest. Oversized wrinkles, tawny age spots, and time and circumstance had taken her body prisoner. Her sunken face was barely visible amongst the hospital-grade pillows, but there was something so familiar about her.

This was the bag lady.

I’d been volunteering with our sick and shut-in ministry for a little more than eight months. I loved volunteering with an overwhelming passion, but today I felt ashamed.

Like most of the kids who lived on the east side, we were bused to a school on the other side of town. Several of us continued attending school there once the mandatory term expired. To do so, we had to ride the city buses. This meant we had to get up with the chickens, but we didn’t mind because riding the city buses made us feel mature. The driver would take a direct route downtown and then we’d have a brief wait before boarding another bus to the west side of town.

Downtown was always full of urbanites engaged in the hustle and bustle city life brought. Some would take time to drop their valuables in the public lockers lined up like little soldiers against a brick wall, and others would sprint by, leaving smells of expensive perfumes and colognes wafting through the air.

You could set your clock by the bag lady. Every morning she made her way through the crowds of people. She never seemed to be in a hurry, and she never seemed purposed.

I laughed when the kids made fun of her. “Bag lady, bag lady, what you got in those bags, bag lady?” they taunted. The kids always threatened to take her bags and threw doughnuts at her from the 24-hour pastry store. I looked at her sleeping in that bed and was overcome with shame. I was ashamed of every giggle. My laughter made me complicit in her shaming.

I saw the medical chart at the foot of her bed. Her name was Emily Winston. I put her chart back, looked around the room for any additional identifying signs, and noticed three bags out of the corner of my eye. They still held a certain mystery for me.

“Open them.” She lifted her emaciated arm and motioned toward the bags, “Go ahead. Open them,” she demanded.

When I touched the first bag, little fibers wisped through the air as the bag gave way. There were charred children’s clothing and blackened keepsakes inside. I was confused by what I found, but my curiosity forced me to obey her. I found Barbie dolls with singed hair and a man’s watch that stopped at exactly 1:32.

The bag lady was no longer talking, but nodding to me to open the other bags. The room reeked of melted plastic, stale smoke, and sheer hopelessness as I reached for the other bags. I began involuntarily weeping for Emily. I desperately tried holding my tears back, but I simply couldn’t. She’d carried these bags for more than 15 years. Each bag carried its own weight of sadness and each weight bowed her body more and more. When I reached the bottom of the third bag, I found a newspaper article. I carefully pulled it out of the bag, hoping to read some juicy gossip about the bag lady or her life.

When I opened the article, a small key fell to the floor. I immediately recognized the key because my mother used to rent one of the lockers downtown. I picked it up, dropped it into my purse, and returned to the article. The headline read: Husband and Children Perish in House Fire. I couldn’t breathe.

The next day I stopped by Emily’s room and found nurses packing up her things. She’d passed away the night before. Emily didn’t list any relatives or friends, so they were taking her things to the city dump. I yelled at them to leave her things alone. “I’ll take them!” I shouted. I reached into my purse to call my husband and instead of grabbing my phone, I unexpectedly felt the cold metal of that locker key.

My husband loaded Emily’s things into our car and we sped downtown to set up a locker rental for Emily’s bags. It was the least I could do. When the monthly bill arrives, I think of her. I think of me. For years, she bore the burden of those bags. Day after day she passed by those lockers, not realizing she had a key to one of them at her disposal. All those years of dragging those bags through the downtown streets, the weight of them wreaking havoc on her muscular system and disfiguring the shape of her skeleton, only to discover she didn’t have to suffer with those burdens. She had a key that would have relieved her from the shame of those bags and from the effect of the weight of them on her body and her life.

Many of us lead lives that are not that different from the bag lady’s life. Sure, we may not have dragged unsightly sacks through busy streets, but we’ve borne burdens God never intended us to carry.

I thought of Emily often after she passed away. Every time I would be in a downtown setting, I saw her moving quietly, almost invisibly, through side streets and dodging small pieces of glazed doughnuts and chocolate eclairs tossed her way by mean children who mercilessly tormented her. I heard the children’s laughter as they thought of new names to call her every week. The more she ignored them, the louder the little bandits became, never realizing that Emily was a woman who meant something to someone. She wasn’t just the bag lady, she was Emily Winston who carried bags she didn’t know how to not carry.

Today, when I see Emily’s locker key resting in a quaint little jewelry box on my dresser, inside a little velvet black bag I purchased specifically for the key, I imagine her reunited with her husband and children in a place where the streets are much more beautiful and the bags . . . well, if there are bags where she is, she’s certainly not carrying them.
