

How can you help the region recover from future disasters?

Join us at one of our upcoming Engagement Sessions.

Imagine a natural disaster in the Portland Metro area. Think about the first month and year after that disaster. What's more important than to rebuild and restore? Imagine five or more years later. What could be done to make the region stronger, healthier, and more equitable than before?

You're Invited!

We invite you to an engagement session to consider these questions along with other community members and stakeholders. The five counties that make up the Portland Metro Region (Clackamas, Clark, Columbia, Multnomah, and Washington) are working with the Regional Disaster Preparedness Organization (RDPO) to develop a Regional Recovery Framework. This Framework will help identify how to build back better and stronger following a disaster.

For the Framework to be successful and to make sure it includes what's important to everyone in the community, we need a wide range of voices at the table. Recovering from a natural disaster requires more than just government. It requires the collaboration of countless stakeholders — including you.

The RDPO is hosting a series of ten engagement sessions between May 2 to May 10, 2018 for you and other key community partners and stakeholders. The sessions are a chance for you to:

Identify the needs of your community before and after a disaster — and what we need to do now to make sure those needs can be met post-disaster.

Understand who needs to do what during recovery, and what your role might be.

Based on your organization's anticipated role in disaster recovery, we request your participation in one or more engagement sessions listed on the following page. You are encouraged to extend this invitation to your colleagues and other stakeholders. Your contributions will have a real impact on the region's recovery from disasters.
