Community Health Pandemic Response Reflection

Please see attached artwork.

It was very difficult to choose just one activity in my Community Health Pandemic Response volunteer work that embodied an instance of “practicing the kind of doctor I want to be” - and so I illustrated several key moments. Throughout my volunteer work I was able to make patients feel welcome and build close connections with other health care workers, practice clinical skills by administering injections, learn about the important work that happens behind the scenes, and most of all, have a lot of fun. To me, being a good doctor means being well-rounded and having the drive to pitch in wherever help is needed. I gained an appreciation for all of the little things that are done to ensure efficiency, the many diverse backgrounds of workers who came together for a common cause, and the personal stories of patients that I took the time to slow down and fully listen to. The accumulation of these components highlighted how compassion and social responsibility are rooted in our community’s pandemic response efforts.

Throughout my volunteer experience, I practiced being flexible, knowledgeable, kind, and enthusiastic, which correlate closely with the professional responsibilities and virtues set forward by the College of Human Medicine. Many of these qualities came naturally as I was given the opportunity to lead in a clinical environment, and others I learned and will continue to learn from my patients and health care professionals throughout my career. I will apply what I have learned from this experience in my future endeavors by being open minded, thoughtful, and always doing my best to make others smile. I am so thankful for the opportunity to serve others and continue growing into the kind of doctor I would one day like to be.
