Just released:

The 2025 data and a bold new model of health

Discover the latest on the health of your county. We've just updated and added new data and resources to improve health as a part of our 2025 Annual Data Release. We've also added:

- A bold new model of health that seeks to broaden our understanding of the forces shaping community conditions;
- A 2025 report on building power for health and equity;
- Refreshed County Health Snapshots and trend graphs and a new national map feature that shows regional patterns and comparisons;
- Six new measures, including access to parks, adverse climate events, lack of social and emotional support, feelings of loneliness, library access and disability: functional limitations; and,
- Updates to our collection of more than 80 health-related measures and data.

Read more about the changes in 2025.

Introducing a bold new model of health

For over a decade, we've measured conditions that influence how well and how long we live — from access to affordable housing to jobs that pay a living wage and opportunities for a good education.

Now, in a new model of health, we're looking at how power and societal rules create conditions that impact everyone's health and the ways we can take action to change them.

2025 report focuses on building power and changing the structures that impact health

The 2025 report uncovers and challenges the structures that create community conditions and shape health and well-being. It introduces the core concepts behind the model of health and looks at the impacts of power, governance, structural racism and societal rules on community conditions like affordable housing, income and education.
