Here come the Superior Stainless Budd Coaches, popular on many US roads!

The Budd Company, known for their metal fabrication and body components to the auto industry, entered the passenger rail car business in the 1930s. Their invention of shotwelding techniques, which joined two sections of stainless steel without damaging the anti-corrosive properties, helped them build some of the nation's most recognizable passenger cars in history. Many of these cars still exist today!

The Budd Company built many types of cars, but their normal coach-style railcars were the most popular. Many roads at the time acquired sizable fleets of coaches to run on commuter, intercity, long distance and executive trains. They usually had two by two seating with padded, comfy chairs along with a giant picture window to take in all of the sights. Our cars feature all of this and then some!

The Rapido Superior Stainless Budd Coach are exactly that: Superior! The cars feature that iconic stainless steel look, interior details that include multi-colored seats and designs, and of course an underbody that rivals none. Every layout needs at least two or three cars. Hey, don't take our word for it, check out these detail shots!

Just a sample of the many underbody details.
How many can you identify?
