

Have you ever wanted to fly under the radar?

What does it feel like when you are unable to do that?

It is not so much that you are trying to hide, it's that you don't want to be the focal point. Some people really want the spotlight, other people don't.

Do you find yourself wanting the spotlight or wanting to be out of the spotlight?

Do you think there is a way to healthily mix the two?

In the next part of the Gospel of Mark, Mark 1: 29-39, we jump in with Jesus right after he finishes teaching at the temple. Jesus goes to the house of one of his disciples. He cured one of their relatives and all the sudden, the whole village showed up.

But while he is healing and interacting with the whole village, he is still keeping a low profile to avoid them knowing who he really is. It says that he would not let the demons speak because they knew him.

The very next day Jesus goes out to be alone. It says that his companions hunted for him. That means they had no idea where they went. Once he was found, he then made the switch and accepted being in the spotlight and they went to new towns.

What do you think changed for Jesus? What made him step into that role of the spotlight?

Are there times in your life where you have needed to step into the spotlight role?

Have you thought about what you 'came to do'?

What about when it will be your moment to take the spotlight?
