

John Seldon, Wastewater Storyteller

Meet John Seldon, the world's first wastewater storyteller. John holds a B.Sc. and M.A. in wastewater management and is the author of the very first mystery novels set in authentically depicted wastewater treatment plants. John's storytelling is informed by his 50 years in the field, including work as a treatment plant manager, in process optimization at a consulting firm, in marketing and sales for an equipment manufacturer, and in an environmental consulting firm, as well as specialization in sludge volume reduction (presses) and tenure as an independent contractor optimizing processes. He has authored numerous technical articles.

that is to come."

"Full of twists and turns that set up a fantastic ending... The book has all the makings of a great story as he aims to introduce the public to the often underappreciated world of wastewater treatment." —Will Fowler, Water Environment & Technology

"A good, entertaining and easy read... Recommendation: pick up a copy of Murder in the Primary; you will enjoy it." —Paul Drca, CWWA WaterSource eBulletin

"Seldon's novels follow WRRF Superintendent Walter Stillwell and Detective Patricia Klein as they unravel the classic question: 'Whodunit?' Central to his writing style is accessibility. Seldon said his approach was creating a narrative that goes beyond the boundaries of water sector jargon and invites readers of all backgrounds to immerse themselves." —Michelle Kuester, WE&T
