Providing an education to all students requires a variety of professionals working together to support students. Technology is a critical component of all classrooms, and assistive technology (AT) is a necessary component of effective classrooms. If you are a school administrator who would like to learn more about supporting assistive technology services in your school(s), we would like to invite you to participate in a statewide study of the book Leading the way to excellence in AT services: A guide for school administrators with peers from around the Commonwealth. A copy of this book will be provided to each participant.

This AT leadership study will be facilitated by members of the state Assistive Technology Network, along with Penny Reed, one of the authors of this book, and Cheryl Temple, Bill Reeder and Jeff Sisk, Virginia leaders in AT. This activity will take place over four sessions from January to April, 2022. Participants will be registered for all four sessions. This opportunity is designed for novices and experts in AT and will focus on how school administrators can positively impact outcomes for students with disabilities with assistive technology through their daily management, supervision, and leadership roles.

Providing effective assistive technology services requires a team approach, and almost certainly the staff you supervise provide these services and supports. Providing effective AT services in schools requires an administrator who can address it from each of these unique perspectives.

We hope you will join us as we review this book and discuss applicable and practical strategies for supporting AT services in your school with your teams.

Target Audience: This AT Leadership Study is designed for leaders and decision-makers of assistive technology services, including supervisors and individuals who provide management of AT personnel and resources, school administrators (principals, assistant principals), division-wide administrators, AT Team leaders, and others who assume these roles. Pending space availability, we encourage teams of two to attend.
