As an Interior Designer at Mayo Clinic, Maggie works on a wide variety of projects that blend aesthetics with the unique needs of healthcare settings. She believes that good interior design has the power to help people thrive in their environments, whether they're providing exceptional patient care, enjoying quality time with loved ones, or finding peace in solitude.

A recent graduate of Iowa State University (2022), Maggie has published research on interior design for older adults with low vision and the role of empathy in interior design, showcasing her commitment to inclusive and compassionate design practices.

As a board member for Art With a Heart In Healthcare and the American Institute of Architects - Academy of Architecture for Health (AIA-AAH), Maggie brings a fresh perspective on how design can influence organizational success and community well-being. She's passionate about using her skills to create environments that foster innovation, encourage collaboration, and promote self-efficacy.

Outside of her professional life, Maggie loves exploring the great outdoors through birdwatching, kayaking, and hiking with her husband and golden retriever, Georgia. Her love for music finds expression in singing in her church choir and taking ballet classes. These activities continually inspire her work and fuel her creativity.
