

“True statecraft is manifest when, in difficult times, we uphold high principles and think of the long-term common good.” (Pope Francis, Laudato Si’, #178)

Dear Member of Congress:

We are Catholic religious orders and organizations from around the United States who write to you grounded in our faith’s call to preserve the dignity of each person, prioritize the needs of people who are poor and vulnerable, and care for God’s creation.

While the coronavirus has made all of us vulnerable to illness and financial setbacks, we know that low-income communities and communities of color face greater risks due to already existing health and economic disparities. We therefore thank you for passing legislation during the upward curve of the pandemic that not only protects our heroic healthcare workers but also provides crucial relief for millions of us and our neighbors who have lost jobs and income.

We see, however, that some communities are still bearing a larger burden from the pandemic and the economic fallout, and we urge you to ease these impacts in future relief packages. Specifically we call for:

- Healthcare resources to be directed to African-American and Latino communities and tribal nations historically and currently harmed by air and water pollution that puts residents at higher risk for respiratory illnesses
- A nationwide moratorium on shut-offs of water, electricity and heat to ensure that low-income households aren’t left more susceptible to the coronavirus due to lack of access to such basic necessities
- Increased funding for energy efficiency programs such as the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) and the Weatherization Assistance Program (WAP) that benefit low-income households.

While these immediate needs are uppermost in our minds, we also are looking ahead toward getting people back to work and building a more resilient and healthy society once the worst of the health crisis has passed. We are compelled to seek a sustainable recovery that reduces risks to communities disproportionately vulnerable to health crises and economic disruption and that addresses the looming global climate crisis that similarly threatens lives and livelihoods.

As we look ahead, our priorities include:

- Investments in clean energy industries such as solar and wind through mechanisms like clean energy tax credits. Studies have shown that these industries are more labor-intensive and create more jobs than do the fossil fuel industries.
- Job training for the clean energy economy of the future, especially creating such opportunities for workers transitioning out of fossil fuel industries and for low-income communities
- Investments in public transportation to ensure workers access to new job opportunities while reducing pollution and helping to mitigate climate change

- Investments in infrastructure to ensure that everyone living in the United States has access to clean water. During the COVID-19 pandemic we see how many vulnerable communities are put at greater risk of infection because they can not engage in recommended hygiene practices.
- Increasing air pollution standards and oversight, especially for mercury and other toxic metals, and upholding environmental impact studies as required by the National Environmental Policy Act. This is necessary to reduce pollution that puts residents of many communities, too often low-income communities of color, at greater risk for viruses like COVID-19.
- Redirecting some of the excessive US military budget to foreign assistance supporting public health, humanitarian programs, disaster preparedness and response, and sustainable infrastructure in developing countries. Boosting security at home now clearly means reducing as much as possible the threats of future global pandemics and the global climate crisis.

The coronavirus has exposed both the weaknesses and strengths of our infrastructure and support systems. Far too many people and communities, left behind in the best of times, are becoming disproportionately vulnerable to COVID-19 and the economic fall-out. Yet we also see a willingness to make individual and collective sacrifices for the common good, and the capacity for governments at all levels to allocate in a short period of time the resources needed to address a global crisis.

In upcoming legislation we urge you to protect those most harmed during the current pandemic while also ensuring that persons who have been shown to be most vulnerable to illness and job losses benefit during the recovery. This also is an important moment to prepare for the next crisis and increase resilience for everyone, regardless of race, class, income and zip code.

Sincerely,
