Course Description

Since the introduction of the use of EMDR with autism in 2003 by Ms. Paulson, her adapted protocol has been used with individuals across the spectrum and has been shared with EMDR therapists around the world. EMDR has made it possible for individuals with even severe autism and other developmental disabilities to process trauma and to reduce symptoms of PTSD, at the same time often reducing the severity of their autism characteristics. This presentation will include a step-by-step description of how to use EMDR with individuals on the autism spectrum while adhering to the original eight-phase EMDR standard protocol. The preparation phase can also become a stand-alone program called "Connecting With Self," useful for children with attachment and trauma related issues. A poster presentation at EMDRIA Minneapolis in 2016 demonstrated that the positive effects of this adapted protocol for individuals with autism have lasted for one traumatized individual from childhood through adulthood.

Objectives:

- Participants will be able to identify at least 5 characteristics of autism that may impact EMDR processing.
- Participants will be able to include additional areas necessary to explore during history taking.
- Participants will be able to use a body scan during preparation for EMDR.
- Participants will learn how to teach various skills necessary for children and some adults to complete EMDR processing without incident.
- Participants will learn a variety of strategies to use for Desensitization in individuals with severe autism.
- Participants will be able to provide EMDR therapy for most individuals with autism using this protocol.
