Fred Rogers

— by Britt McCombs —

Fred Rogers

I admire Fred Rogers. He was the writer and star of Mr. Rogers' Neighborhood from 1968 to 2001. He made a television program for children about kindness. When the show started, black people were not treated equally. They were not allowed to share spaces like swimming pools with white people. Mr. Rogers invited Officer Clemmons, a black actor, to cool his feet in a wading pool. When the officer had to leave, he used Mr. Rogers' towel to dry his feet. Mr. Rogers showed children someone they looked up to treating a black person with respect. Fred Rogers made himself an example of how all people should behave to others. He was respectful and kind. In conclusion, I think if everyone behaved like Mr. Rogers, the world would be a better place.

Good people

My stories about good people

Good and kind deeds of people are never forgotten. We were three little children, one year apart, and we had a grandmother. Our parents worked as school teacher. We stayed home with our grandmother. Sometimes we misbehaved, broke things, and made things dirty. However, our grandmother didn't scold us or put us in the corner, but patiently explained everything we were doing and wrong. I think such people deserve great respect.
