

How to Choose and Move to a Memory Care Assisted Living Community During the COVID-19 Pandemic

In these extraordinary times, we are taking more precautions than even before to guard the safety of our precious senior community, and those with memory care needs. Recognizing that seniors are in the high-risk group for the virus, stringent measures have been put into place in terms of social distancing and limiting interactions with the community. These factors make it more difficult when evaluating how to provide for a love one's care if it is becoming too difficult to do this at home, or if they are living alone.

Reading the news make you feel like an assisted living community is not safe since the virus easily spreads, but if the need for daily professional care is there, it may still be the best choice. Especially when you consider that fact that home care can also pose a risk if a senior is living alone with outside help or if they are living with your family who could contract the virus while out in the community. As schools open this fall, this may become a larger concern than it has been in previous months.

Residential care facilities have put into place very strict measures for the protection of residents and staff. Being into a community also ensures they will have everything they need and not have to go out to pick up food and other daily living supplies.

What to Consider

When is it time for Assisted Living?

Look at different factors to help make your decision as to whether or not now is the right time. Those who may need assistance sooner include:

- Seniors who have Alzheimer's or another form of Dementia and caregiving at home is no longer an option.
- Those who need help with activities of daily living; taking medicines, bathing, dressing, meals and housekeeping, or if safety is a concern.
- Those who are medically compromised and who are living with family members who cannot stay at home and there is not a private bedroom or bathroom to provide social distancing.
- Those who are living at home and are having emotional issues.

How to Find the Right Community

Assisted Living communities across the country have mandated protocols to follow as outlined by the CDC and their State Health Department. This will include restriction of visitors and/or set guidelines for visits, conducting testing and health screening of everyone in the community, required PPE, strict housekeeping/cleaning procedures, and guidelines for dining and activities.

So even in these extraordinary times, Assisted Living can offer the perfect amount of support that is just right for your loved one. Whether it's having help with things like dressing, personal care, medication management or housekeeping, or extra support with transfer or mobility assistance, Assisted Living can help your loved one to continue to live their most independent lifestyle.

To research which community is best for your family, use these questions as a reference in reviewing and evaluating websites, taking virtual tours and making phone calls. Look at website photo galleries and face book pages to get a sense of their culture and daily life; identify if they are a nonprofit or for-profit organization and learn if they have received any recent awards for their care. Word of mouth, reputation and reviews/testimonials are also important in making an informed decision. Some communities are able to arrange for a video chat, to get to know them even better.
